A licensed teacher who is knowledgeable about the effects of coagulation disorders on young persons serves as the educational consultant. This position plays an instrumental and educational role with patients, families, and school personnel on the needs of young people with this chronic condition. This role advocates for the rights of young people with coagulation disorders and links patients/families with vocational services through young adulthood for optimal job training, education and potential.